

the one part, and the interests and honour of Europe on the other. It is of the utmost importance in the present crisis that the people of Great Britain in particular, without distinction of party, without heat and without prejudice, should weigh the facts which have become part and parcel of history, and estimate the duties and responsibilities which these facts have created.

